motion of trade. In the negotiations which followed the Tonkin War a commercial concession took a prominent place from the outset, and a monopoly of railroad construction in China was mooted as a compensation for the indemnity which France had threatened to levy on China. The negotiations left but one issue, in the treaty which was eventually concluded, to wit, in Article 7, which without the knowledge of what led up to it would be utterly meaningless. For it amounts to no more than a promise on the part of China to betake herself to French manufacturers when it suits her. The Chinese attached no practical significance to the stipulation. To the French, however, this clause was the residuum of their demand for exclusive commercial privileges, and they affected to interpret it as intended to confer such. With this idea in their minds they were doubtless well advised in attempting to give practical effect to it as soon as possible, and accordingly the Consul, M. RUSSELMAN, who is understood to have received a promise from Li Hsiang-shan—a Li Chiao-shan of the post of Director-General of Chinese Railways, went to France to stir up the financial and commercial communities to an appreciation of the tempting fields awaiting their enterprise in China. The result was the formation of the famous Syndicate whose different sections were coordinated by the Comptoir d'Exploitation which set up an agency in Tientsin expressly to serve the Syndicate of manufacturers and contractors, and which unconsciously foreshadowed coming events by offering higher interest on deposits than other banks could afford.

The Syndicate like some other institutions was top-heavy. It opened with delay its agencies received fabulous salaries; and the one thing about it secured from its inception was that its expenses should be on a princely scale. The first orders it received from the Chinese were taken at
